

Controlling Reproduction to Control the Human Race

Mathew Crawford

Between articles, I will often have presearch and speculative commentary in my videos at the RTE Locals channel.

All that I can say is that I very much hope that I am wrong about this, but in my extended research about everything going on over the past three years, I recently began to focus on human cloning. Disturbingly, everything I'm finding fits into a bigger picture of a new prize so large [in the eyes of the Kunlangeta] that it is with reorganizing the world around, and possibly fighting wars over (though the wars may simply be ways to make people poor so that they cannot resist the technocracy).

What to keep an eye on while building a better understanding of this possibility:

- Evidence of hidden cloning programs.
- Evidence of a relationship between mRNA vaccines and other genetic technologies that can be part of human cloning research or programs.
- Evidence of nonstate actors capable of leveraging state power.
- Evidence of cults involved in playing serious power games. I would include Effective Altruism in the mix. Ideological groups often barely and rhetorically dodge the cult categorization. In particular, there are numerous UFO cults that are involved in the Futurist and Transhumanist communities. Understand that I do not consider all of the people in these communities bad, by any stretch. Exploration of possibilities and technological future is necessary, but I fear that many gathered in these communities are like humanitarian shields.

Understand that I already have a three-digit number of pages of notes on the topic of human cloning, and perhaps over a thousand when counting my research into cults (I'm sorry that I haven't had time to write so much about it).

In the meantime, I'm still working on a draft of The Efficacy Illusion. My friend Tonika is working on a book cover that will hopefully be inviting to a wide audience who may or may not be inclined to give a challenge to the prevailing hypothesis a fair read.

In other news, Liam's time with RTE has sadly come to an end. Well, he is still a member of the community in good standing, but we will not get the benefit of his increasingly well done Friday deep dives (I could call them news reports, and they started as such, but as he found his footing with that project, detailed focus was the right choice). Those reports are of high quality, and are undervalued in a crowded media field. I am wholly glad for him to get to spend more time with his music. A future worth fighting for is a future where we all have the opportunity to grow with our arts.

I am in the process of reorganizing my priorities. Perhaps the RTE podcast is now in flux, and I may simply schedule recordings at times when I have a rare conversation that needs to take place (and isn't likely to take place elsewhere) and when I have highly complete slideshows that can serve as quasi-documentaries.

In the meantime, I am grateful for the support of thirty-something thousand readers, and those generous enough to support my time here. My hope is that the work I'm doing helps feed important conversations, and to help to educate amidst the firehose of information warfare cluttering every medium around us. It is likely that future articles will be less frequent, but more complete at times—perhaps with a few shorter articles like this one tossed in.
